AGENDA

Global Outlook

Governments will gain substantially from approximately US$123 billion in taxation this year. That's the equivalent to 45% of the industry's GVA (Gross Value Added, which is the firm level equivalent to GDP) paid to governments in payroll, social security, corporate and product taxes. Charges for services are not included in this figure.

The global taxation cost impact continues to grow and the threat from governments to introduce new punitive taxes to reduce budget deficits is constant. The challenge is significant and more present than ever.

So far in 2017, while there have been certain notable successes, States continue to be very creative and are finding new ways to attempt to tax our industry. The challenges include high taxation costs in many regions, the proliferation of "taxation" measures that fall outside the provisions of Double Tax Treaties, VAT levied on international air transport and related services, as well as existing and newly proposed air passenger ticket taxes.

On the Tax Radar

Governments impose taxes to increase revenue, or to discourage activities, or both. Whatever the reason, excessively taxing aviation makes little economic sense. Taxes suppress growth – with a wider effect on jobs, investment and overall economic output. The fact that the negative effects of taxation will outweigh the tax revenue is our recurring message to governments. You will be provided with an update of IATA's taxation activities during the year.

In addition to getting you up to speed on the many recent industry taxation challenges faced worldwide, there will be a series of presentations as well as interactive group discussions – speakers will include tax experts from our strategic partners, airline tax professionals, and State tax authorities¹ have been invited to attend. Building on the success of the format of previous Industry Taxation Meetings, participants will again have an opportunity to discuss tax policy in smaller breakout groups to manage their tax issues correctly, to share best practices, compliance, views on campaigns and be involved in priorities and key strategies to ensure fair tax treatment of international air transport.

Regional Focus

Get a better view of the taxation challenges being faced by airlines around the globe. You can help influence our industry campaigns, identify current and future challenges and propose action by taking part in informal discussions. You can make a significant contribution to IATA's 2018 work program to ease the global tax burden and achieve real results for the industry.

Regional discussions will allow airlines with specific local concerns to share information on tax developments and help influence ways to step up pressure on governments and tax authorities to avoid unfair tax treatment for our industry.
